

Please keep the code requirement. The people crying out to drop it only want a free ride. At least for now, there is one small scrap of each band where I can congregate with other people who I know love the science of electronics and have respect for ham radio enough to work hard for it. No-Code International's assertion that "no evidence exists that Morse proficiency is an indicator of a desirable, motivated or better qualified operator" is just ridiculous. There already exists a license that does not require code. But they're not happy with that, they want it all. It's easy to memorize the Q&A sample tests and pass the written test, but you can't cheat on the CW exam. What's next, remove all technical proficiency requirements?
